Keep It Simple. This feature is based on the motto of the modernist movement. It helps you write with passion, clarity, and purpose. : Build it Simple. The . A modern text editor has this feature. The third version included many new features and improved performance; it allowed programmable key bindings, a search function and a macro recording function. The previous version had been developed in PHP, but this new one was done in C++. The final version was released on 5 January 2006 and was called Hemingway Editor 4. The fourth release was the last one. At the time, it included a few basic grammar checking features, yet it was still far from a complete modern text editor. Hemingway Editor 5 In June 2007, Paul Eagleton released Hemingway Editor 5, which he described as "a real modern editor that uses all the latest technologies including native Linux support, Vim command line interface, and Apache 2.0/PHP 5.2.0" as well as an introduction to the Text::CSV Perl module. The editor is available from his website. The POS application calls a function to get the location of the USB token and writes a string to the console window. When the console window closes, the service loses the token. Is there any way to prevent this? It seems to me like it is the expected behavior, but I don't want my service to become unstable as there is no way to recover. I am using a named pipe created by this function: HANDLE open_named_pipe(char* path, DWORD dwDesiredAccess, DWORD dwShareMode, LPSECURITY_ATTRIBUTES lpSecurityAttributes) I am using CreateNamedPipe() to open the pipe: HANDLE open_pipe(LPCTSTR pszPipe) | HANDLE hPipe; hPipe = CreateNamedPipe(pszPipe,
