In many cases, pairs of receivers and transmitters operate in parallel to increase throughput for data communications. High-speed data communication links between a transmitter and a receiver include a number of discrete components such as transmitter and receiver circuits and a media medium. Each component in the communication link may generate errors as a result of various factors, such as noise or aging of the component or the components connected to it, temperature, and signal propagation characteristics. These errors, even when they are of a low level, may propagate through the communication link and have a cumulative effect that lowers overall performance of the communication link. To detect and reduce errors in a high-speed serial data communication link, cyclic error detection coding is often used to convey a series of error detection bits between the receiver and transmitter. The receiver uses the error detection bits to determine if the data received from the transmitter is correct. The error detection coding may be implemented in the transmitter or the receiver, or a combination of both. There are a variety of different error correction techniques that use error detection coding. Of these, Manchester encoding is relatively inexpensive to implement. Manchester encoding uses an encoding scheme in which a data transmission includes a series of pulses with polarity that defines the encoding. One problem with Manchester encoding is that it cannot encode data to be received at a receiver within a single clock cycle. Because a typical receiver may be clocked at a frequency that is a fraction of the data transmission frequency, encoding of the data requires extra time in the transmission cycle. The extra time to perform encoding may cause the transmitted data to be delayed when additional pulses are added to the encoding scheme. To address this problem, encoding can be performed at the transmitter, which separates transmission of encoded data from transmission of data to be transmitted. The encoded data is then transmitted in the same cycle as the data to be transmitted. The decoded data is then re-concatenated with the encoded data at the receiver. Because the encoding and decoding operations can be performed in a single clock cycle, Manchester encoding is a suitable encoding scheme for high-speed serial communications. One problem with Manchester encoding is that the error
