Central venous catheter placement complications: the endoscopic alternative. The rate of central venous catheter (CVC) placement complications has increased. The safety of endoscopic CVC placement has not been studied. The study was undertaken to determine the safety of endoscopic CVC placement. This retrospective chart review examined all patients undergoing CVC placement between January 1, 1993, and September 30, 1999, at a Level I Trauma Center. Over the 5-year period, 558 CVC placements were performed in 549 patients. All procedures were performed in the operating room with endoscopic assistance. Twenty-four patients were excluded because their records did not include CVC placement or endoscopic data. The procedures performed in 434 patients consisted of 203 chest venous catheter placements, 143 catheterizations of both chest and neck veins, and 144 catheterizations of other vessels. Indications for catheterization included treatment of sepsis and severe electrolyte abnormalities. Procedures were performed on an inpatient basis and included sternotomy in 33 cases, thoracotomy in 46 cases, and other procedures in 245 cases. Access was achieved in all cases. Complications occurred in 22 (5.1%) of the 434 patients. Perforation of the pericardium was noted in one patient; persistent bleeding was noted in three patients. Endoscopic CVC placement is a safe alternative to more open techniques. It can be used in place of blind CVC placement. Tag: my life as an empty vessel I've read an interesting article about a student who's having a hard time in his relationships with his friends. (The title is: My Life as an Empty Vessel.) In that article, the student describes how he is the same person when he's with his parents or his friends as he is when he's with his wife. In other words, the emptiness of his heart is revealed when he's around his parents and friends. The article is one of the many examples of people who are wounded souls being seduced by the wrong people and being consumed by the wrong things
