The subject matter disclosed herein relates to a thermal-combustion dual fuel system and, more specifically, a method of operation and control for a thermal-combustion dual fuel system. A thermal-combustion (TC) dual fuel system with a combustion chamber of a gas turbine has been used to increase the efficiency of fuel utilization by generating high temperature heat by burning different type fuels alternatively. With the TC dual fuel system, if fossil fuels (e.g., petroleum fuels) and biomass fuels (e.g., bituminous coal and lignite) are used, the higher heat produced by burning the fossil fuels can be recovered through a heat exchanger (for example, a heat exchanger with a cooling effect). The heat exchanger can be used as a source of heat to generate steam. If the generated steam is used for industrial-scale power generation, the fuel utilization efficiency of the gas turbine is enhanced. Particularly, if the recovered heat from the heat exchanger is transferred to a condenser and the liquid heat is vaporized, the flammability level of the condensed liquid should be reduced as compared to the vaporization temperature of the liquid heat (e.g., water) to prevent a fire. To achieve the above-mentioned heat recovering condition, the heat of the fossil fuels and that of the biomass fuels is to be transmitted to the heat exchanger. To accomplish this, the TC dual fuel system can include a fossil fuel fired burner and a biomass fuel fired burner. The fossil fuel fired burner can be disposed upstream of the heat exchanger. Likewise, the biomass fired burner can be disposed downstream of the heat exchanger. The fossil fuel fired burner and the biomass fired burner can be independently operated to produce heat for the heat exchanger. To operate the biomass fired burner, a combustion air supply system may be provided in the TC dual fuel system to supply air to the biomass fired burner. The combustion air supply system can include a compressor and a combustor. The air compressor can compress air to deliver the compressed air to the combustor. The combustor can include a first combustion chamber and a second combustion chamber disposed upstream and downstream of the first combustion chamber, respectively. The first combustion chamber can receive compressed air from the compressor and combust the compressed air with the fossil fuel. The second combustion chamber can receive compressed air from the compressor and combust the compressed air with the biomass fuel.
