The proposed training program of the Dartmouth Center on the Social and Ethical Issues in Mental Health Services is designed to train a new cadre of mental health care and social policy analysts with the appropriate training and research skills to serve as catalysts for policy change in mental health services in this country. The curriculum aims to develop a theoretical framework in which to understand, analyze and critique mental health policies, practices and programs in an environment of service delivery, financing, quality assurance, rights, consumer advocacy, and consumer protection. In addition, the curriculum provides training in the design, implementation and evaluation of complex social policy research studies in an ethical manner. The training program is comprised of a basic core curriculum that begins with a focus on social policy and the philosophy, theory and methods of qualitative and quantitative research in the social sciences; then, we build upon this foundation by providing a background in the philosophy, theory and methods of assessment and evaluation of mental health programs; and finally, we wrap up with a focus on mental health policy and service delivery. The trainees enter our program at the graduate student level, but are prepared at the postdoctoral level by the faculty of the Social Science Research Training program at the Dartmouth Institute for Health Policy and Clinical Practice. Training is carried out within the framework of the Department of Social Relations at Dartmouth, which is at the forefront of the study of social policy and mental health. Moreover, the diversity of the faculty and programs within the Department of Social Relations generates an exceptional environment for training in research, prevention, and policy relevant to mental health services.
